

OPAVLOVCE NAD UHOM, Slovakia N the night of Feb. 7, Tibor Tancos and Vlasta Tancosova were walking along the edge of the street with their 12-year-old son, Tomas, when a drunk in a blue-green Honda ran them down with his car. Tomas survived, but his parents died.

The police in this northeast corner of Slovakia aren't so efficient in the best of times, but in post-Communist Slovakia, open discrimination against the Roma, or Gypsies, is the norm. Rather than arresting the suspect, a well-known Slovak business-mafia type, the police have instead threatened family members and have beaten some of them, the family says. The grandfather in the household, also named Tibor Tancos, has complained but expects no justice. "Nothing will come of it," he said. "We have no rights here, we Roma."

The Roma are Europe's stateless people, at least eight million of them scattered and mostly reviled throughout central and eastern Europe. While half a million Roma died in the Holocaust, which the Roma call "the devouring," they remain the one people in the modern, democratic, post-Communist Europe whom it is largely acceptable to persecute.

Europe talks much of common aspirations and a continental identity. But the 1990's made clear that Europe's most virulent problem remains prejudice toward minorities and their exclusion from a full range of democratic rights.

The Yugoslav civil wars focused attention on the dangers of a militant nationalism, but in a misleading way. When most of Europe goes to war with a small corner of the continent to defend the rights of an oppressed people in Kosovo, it can seem as if Europeans have learned the lesson of tolerance and are simply disciplining an outmoded recalcitrant, Slobodan Milosevic.

But the worsening plight of the Roma and the increasing intolerance in central and eastern Europe after 1989 are bracing antidotes to smugness about the post-Communist spread of shared values.

The Roma have been despised for centuries as alien, thieving subhumans (or as singing-and-dancing cartoons out of "Carmen") with no allegiance to their countries or the law. Their culture and habits combine with discrimination to produce a cycle of poverty, poor schooling, bad health care and unemployment that are a function of prejudice but also feed it, contributing to crime rates, isolation and suspicion of outsiders.

But the new Europe — west or east — shows little interest in breaking the cycle of isolation and prejudice. There is no offer of inclusion in society, or even, as here in Slovakia, much protection from racial discrimination and violence, whether from neo-fascist skinheads or the police.

The treatment of the Roma — including a denial of asylum in countries like Britain, Belgium, Denmark and Sweden — raises
