

If you have a group of six or more, tape an index card with a name written on it onto the back of each guy. Then give an explanation like this—

Each of you has the name of a famous male taped on your back. It's your job to figure out who he is by asking each other yes-or-no questions. For example, you can ask, "Is my person an athlete?" but you may not ask, "What kind of work does he do?" Once you've asked one question, you can answer one question. Then you have to move to a different person.

Let the students mingle for several minutes while asking questions. When each person has figured out his name (or after 10 minutes), pull your group together and ask questions like these.

- What kind of questions were most helpful in identifying your person (questions about occupation? appearance? age?)?
- What makes your person famous?
- What do you admire about your person?
- If your person is well-liked, what do you think draws people to him?
