

■ NO BIG DEAL

Andy ditched his first-period government class to go out to breakfast with his girl friend. It was a boring class anyway. A substitute teacher was showing a film he had already seen in another class last year. The student aide promised to mark him present. No harm done. Besides, everybody did it. Andy had ditched lots of classes all through high school, and he still had a 3.8 average.

The government teacher saw Andy and his girl friend leaving the campus and decided to give Andy's mother a call. That evening his mother asked him how his government class was that day.

Melinda was crying because her poem was selected by the English teacher to be printed in the school yearbook. Why do things like this always happen to me? she thought. All she had done was copy a poem out of her father's book of poetry. Never in a million years did she think something like this would happen. She was sure her father would recognize the poem.
